Studying the work-life balance of women professionals in Greece under crisis was not an easy task. As the qualitative research is extremely demanding and time consuming the present undertaking could not have been accomplished without the co-operation of the research population. We feel indebted to all the women professionals participating to our research undertaking and we wish to thank them all for their kind and cordial reception of our interview requests.

We wish also to thank all our colleagues and members of the research team of EKKE for their co-operation throughout the research process, especially Katerina Sava for assisting the work of editing. Moreover we would like to thank Maria Katechi for her significant contribution in the translation of some original texts. Moreover, we would like to thank all participants of the project, namely the Family and Childcare Centre (KMOP), who was the project's co-ordinator, the Greek League for Women's Rights, and the Institute of Social Sciences of the University of Iceland, for their cordial co-operation.
